asked, knowing that he would. He gave me a look, and I knew he was in a great deal of pain. "I can't stand any more pain." He gestured to the couch. "Well, then, I can't either." I closed the door behind me. "What do you think will happen to me now?"
"He will let you know what he decides." I looked down. I did not want to tell him that he would die within the week. "What about the rest of them?" "You're all safe here." I thought, but I could not say that out loud. "I'm glad you're here," he said. I stood and put the window box on the coffee table. "I'll leave you alone now." "You're sure?" I could not look at him. I nodded.
"Good." I went downstairs and put the kettle on for tea. And, if there was one thing I had learned in my career, I knew that it did not matter what I did. I might as well leave them dead in that house as come back and start again the next day. "So I'm not going to have to work anymore?" he asked when the kettle was boiling. "I'm sorry," I said. "I'm sure it will help you." "That's good." I put two cups down in front of him and pulled a pot of tea from the cupboard. "So, what happens now?" I had not expected that.
"When they decide what to do with you, I have to go back to England. My wife is expecting me." "Is that all you've got to say?"
"No." I couldn't help it. "I'm sorry." He frowned, but there was no answer to that. "I've got 82157476af
